JAM SOFTWARE DEVELOPMENT. Affective effects of sex hormone replacement therapy in young and middle-aged women. To compare the effects of transdermal estradiol and oral micronized progesterone on mood, sexual function, and overall satisfaction in naturally menopausal women aged 40 to 55 years. Descriptive analysis of the data. Academic medical center. 75 women who had reached natural menopause (N = 36 per hormone group) and completed all questionnaires at baseline, 3 months, and 6 months were included in the analysis. Each subject started on 0.25 mg of estradiol transdermally (n = 21) or 1 mg of micronized oral progesterone (n = 17) for 6 months, with the dose being adjusted according to the woman's menstrual symptoms. Psychosocial measures using the Profile of Mood States (POMS), Functional Assessment of Sexuality Questionnaire (FASQ), Sexual Satisfaction Profile (SSP), and the Subjective Sexual Function Scale (SSFS) were administered at 0, 3, and 6 months. Sexual function and overall satisfaction (SSP/SSFS). There were significant improvements in the 0- to 6-month change scores for the vigor and fatigue scales of the POMS, the sexual experience and satisfaction scales of the FASQ, and the sexual satisfaction, desire, arousal, lubrication, and orgasm scales of the SSP. There was a significant drop in overall satisfaction (P = 0.02) with testosterone replacement therapy (TRT). Patients taking estradiol transdermally experienced more dryness, more vaginal irritation, greater venous irritation, and were more satisfied overall than those taking oral progesterone (P = 0.01). There were no significant changes in the 0- to 6-month change scores for the anxiety or depression scales of the POMS, the intercourse satisfaction and pain scales of the FASQ, or the arousal and orgasm scales of the SSP. After TRT, 1cdb36666d
