Independent predictors of survival in patients with chronic lymphocytic leukemia: a disease-specific analysis from the German CLL Study Group. A disease-specific analysis of factors affecting survival in patients with chronic lymphocytic leukemia (CLL) was conducted within a cohort of 1066 patients diagnosed with CLL between 1991 and 2000. Univariate and multivariate analyses were performed to identify independent factors. The median overall survival time was 77 months for the entire cohort. In the univariate analysis of CLL-specific survival, a poor performance status (ECOG 2), advanced stage at diagnosis, low leukocyte count, and a high percentage of immature lymphocytes and prolymphocytes were the most significant negative prognostic factors. In the multivariate analysis, only a low leukocyte count, a high percentage of immature lymphocytes and a poor performance status remained significant. Our results suggest that the identification of patients with a low leukocyte count at the time of diagnosis may help to select those patients with a very good prognosis., it's time to start a process. "On the 26th of February, we'll be going to court," he says. In April, the bank's lawyers will be presenting their case. But I will be there to give my evidence. I've been advised to tell the judge that, in my book, I have a moral obligation to publish the names of those who did their utmost to prevent my grandmother's death. They have a right to their names. I hope one day to have the chance to meet the ten people who are taking legal action against me. But for now, that will have to do. At the end of the day, I'll be publishing what I have, no matter what anyone says. I think it's right. *I refer to her only as "the woman" or "she" to avoid causing unnecessary offence.
